4 THINGS TO KNOW

Ex cop guilty in wrong-apartment slaying

The former Dallas officer faces life in prison for shooting a man in his own home.

A Dallas jury found former police officer Amber Guyger guilty on Tuesday of murder when she accidentally walked into a neighbor's apartment thinking it was her own and shot him dead as he ate ice cream.

The Sept. 6, 2018, killing of Botham Jean, a 26-year-old black PwC accountant, by a white officer sparked street protests, particularly when prosecutors initially opted to bring the lesser charge of manslaughter against Guyger, 31.

"We the jury unanimously find the defendant Amber Guyger guilty of murder as charged in the indictment," Judge Tammy Kemp read aloud to the courtroom from the jurors' statement. A sob cut the judge off and Kemp paused to address the courtroom: "No outbursts."

Guyger, 31, could face life in prison for the slaying.

It is relatively rare for U.S. police officers to be convicted of murder for shooting people they view as suspects. But unlike other recent high-profile killings, such as those of Michael Brown in Missouri and Philando Castile in Minnesota, Guyger was not on duty or responding to a reported crime when she pulled the trigger.

"Botham was the best we had to offer. It shouldn't take all that for unarmed black and brown people to get justice," said civil rights attorney Benjamin Crump, who is representing the Jean family.

This verdict is for Trayvon Martin, for Michael Brown ... for Eric Garner ... for so many unarmed black and brown unarmed human beings across America." Martin was shot and killed in 2012 by a civilian neighborhood watchman in Florida, who was cleared. Garner died in 2014 when a New York police officer put him in a prohibited chokehold. That officer was fired last month.

> "I'm so sorry, I'm so sorry. I have to live with this every single day,"
> Amber Guyger

Guyger, who had spent four years on the force before the killing, took the rare step of testifying in her own defense during her trial, tearfully expressing regret for shooting Jean but saying she had believed her life was in danger when she pulled the trigger.

During the trial, Guyger's defense attorney said she was "on autopilot" after a long work day, when she mistakenly parked on the wrong floor in the garage and was able to enter Jean's apartment because he had left the door slightly ajar.

"I'm so sorry, I'm so sorry. I have to live with this every single day," Guyger told the jury of eight women and four men.

In cross-examination, Assistant District Attorney Jason Hermus asked her, "When you shot him twice, you intended to kill him, didn't you?"

"I did," Guyger responded, in a calm voice.

Prosecutors also argued that Guyger did little to help Jean even after realizing her mistake, calling the 911 emergency phone number for an ambulance but not administering first aid.

Hermus also told the jury that Guyger missed blatant clues that she was not in her own apartment - including the smell of marijuana smoke - because she was distracted after a 16-minute phone call on her commute with her former police partner.

In her testimony, Guyger told jurors that the shooting "is not about hate; it's about being scared."

Guyger sat alone at the defendant's table, wiping away tears, after the verdict was read.

Neither prosecutors nor the defense focused on race during the trial.

"You had someone who was unarmed, unaggressive eating a bowl of ice cream, and somebody barged in and shot him to death," Merritt told reporters after the verdict was read. "We believed the right verdict would come out, though we knew that in America that is rare." REUTERS

2 Judge says Harvard Univ. admissions is constitutional

A federal judge ruled that Harvard University's undergraduate admissions program is constitutional, rejecting a challenge accusing the school of discrimination against Asian-American applicants.In a decision released on Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Allison Burroughs in Boston said that while Harvard's admissions program is not perfect, "the court will not dismantle a very fine admissions program that passes constitutional muster, solely because it could do better."The case had pitted the Ivy League school against Students for Fair Admissions, which opposes affirmative action policies and whose case was backed by the administration of U.S. President Donald Trump.Burroughs ruled nearly a year after holding a non-jury trial. 3 Sanders raises $25.3M, Buttigieg $19M in 3rd quarter

U.S. presidential hopefuls Bernie Sanders and Pete Buttigieg released strong third-quarter fundraising totals on Tuesday that are likely to place them near the top of the Democratic field, with Sanders bringing in $25.3 million and Buttigieg $19.1 million. Senator Cory Booker, who has languished in the low single-digits in polls, reported that he raised more than $6 million from July through September. They were the first of the 19 candidates seeking the Democratic nomination to challenge President Donald Trump in the November 2020 election to report their fundraising totals for the quarter, which ended at midnight on Monday. Sanders, whose status in opinion polls as the No. 2 candidate for the party's nomination behind Joe Biden has been threatened by a surge in support for fellow progressive Elizabeth Warren, hauled in more than any candidate has raised in any quarter so far. 4 Teen protester shot by Hong Kong police

Hong Kong police shot a teenage protester on Tuesday, the first to be hit by live ammunition in almost four months of unrest in the Chinese-ruled city, amid violent clashes on the 70th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic.Cat-and-mouse clashes spread from the shopping district of Causeway Bay to the Admiralty area of government offices on Hong Kong island, and then on to the New Territories bordering mainland China, with police firing tear gas and water cannon at petrol bomb throwing activists. Police said an officer shot an 18-year-old man in the shoulder in the Tsuen Wan area of the New Territories with a live round. Protesters have previously been hit with bean bags rounds and rubber bullets and officers have fired live rounds in the air. REUTERS

Pompeo pushes back on U.S. House impeachment inquiry into Trump

The Secretary of State is being accused of "stonewalling" the impeachment inquiry.

Secretary of State Mike Pompeo on Tuesday objected to a move by the U.S. House of Representatives to obtain depositions from five current and former State Department officials as part of an impeachment inquiry targeting President Donald Trump, accusing Democrats of bullying and intimidation.

The five have been scheduled to give depositions this week and next as the Democratic-led House looks into Trump's request to Ukraine's president during a July phone call to investigate a domestic political rival, Democratic presidential candidate Joe Biden.

The officials "may not attend any interview or deposition" without executive branch counsel present to control disclosure of confidential information and questions, Pompeo wrote in a letter to House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Eliot Engel.

Engel and two other Democratic committee chairmen issued a statement accusing Pompeo of "stonewalling" the impeachment inquiry, and called him a "fact witness" in the investigation based on media reports that he had listened in on the call.

"He should immediately cease intimidating department witnesses in order to protect himself and the president," Engel and Representatives Adam Schiff and Elijah Cummings said.

Democrats last week launched the impeachment effort in light of a whistleblower complaint against the Republican president by a person within the U.S. intelligence community who accused Trump of soliciting foreign interference in the 2020 U.S. election for his personal political benefit.

The impeachment inquiry could lead to approval of articles of impeachment, or formal charges, against Trump in the House. That would lead to a trial in the Senate on whether to remove him from office but the president's fellow Republicans control that chamber and have shown little appetite for removing him.

Pompeo objected to Engel's request for the officials to be made available for depositions. The officials include former U.S. Ambassador to Ukraine Marie Yovanovitch and former U.S. special representative for Ukraine Kurt Volker.

In a letter posted on Twitter, Pompeo told Engel, "I am concerned with aspects of your request that can be understood only as an attempt to intimidate, bully and treat improperly the distinguished professionals of the Department of State, including several career Foreign Service Officers, whom the committee is now targeting. Bills expand zones where marijuana stores are banned

GETTY IMAGES

"What that does is create, effectively, a ban in our city," said one Boston resident.

Marijuana businesses are already prohibited near schools and hopeful cannabis entrepreneurs turned out on Tuesday to oppose bills that would add houses of worship, daycares and places where children might congregate to the list of places marijuana companies must stay away from.

State law bans marijuana establishments from being "located within 500 feet of a pre-existing public or private school providing education in kindergarten or any of grades 1 through 12." Bills filed by Rep. Hannah Kane and Sen. Joseph Boncore at the request of a constituent would add to that list any "daycare center, or any facility in which children commonly congregate," and "church, synagogue temple, or place of worship."

Chauncy Spencer, a Boston resident who is working to open a marijuana retail store in the city, told the Committee on Cannabis Policy that the bills would severely limit where his company could operate.

"What that does is create, effectively, a ban in our city. There are over 100 churches, just churches alone, in the city of Boston and probably more daycares," he said. Spencer added that the bills would disproportionately harm minority business owners. "I would hope that we would be careful about implementing such bans because we were supposed to include people from these areas in the industry and not lock them out."

Devonta Davis and Cleon Byron, co-owners of a marijuana company that is trying to establish itself in Boston, said there are 10 churches and six daycare centers within three blocks of their location along Blue Hill Avenue. They said they have been transparent with those groups about their business plan.

"We've talked to the community, we're part of the community," Davis said. "We've been in contact with the churches, we've been in contact with the daycares and they seem to be on our side. So I don't understand where these bills are coming from."

Davis and Byron each said that they want to be part of the diversity of the cannabis industry, but feel that there's always something holding back people of color from fully participating in the newly legal industry.

"We've been in contact with the churches, we've been in contact with the daycares and they seem to be on our side."

Devonta Davis

"The economic impacts of these bills are just as harmful as the War on Drugs, which was proven to target minority communities, and I see these bills as targeting minority businesses," Davis said. "We have been told that throughout this entire process that social equity is a top priority in Massachusetts, yet at every turn there seems to be an attack on the economic capabilities of minority communities and businesses."

Equity is a central component of the marijuana law passed by voters in 2016 and the law as rewritten by the Legislature the following year. The law mandates that the Cannabis Control Commission adopt "procedures and policies to promote and encourage full participation in the regulated marijuana industry by people from communities that have previously been disproportionately harmed by marijuana prohibition and enforcement and to positively impact those communities." Don't mess with Helen McCrory

The actress talks progression of series and epic buildup in "Peaky Blinders" season 5.

MOLLY GIVEN
Molly.Given@metro.us

In the epic gangster family series "Peaky Blinders" there is always a lot of action going on. Over the course of five seasons, some would say the explosions have gotten bigger, the fights bloodier and the characters more colorful than ever. With the series' lifeline plot mounting on the success of the combative Shelby family, it's easy to see why the addicting story line's only option is to escalate. With the highly anticipated season 5 in the midst, many are wondering what could be in store for the band of polarizing individuals that make up the Peaky Blinders. Helen McCrory, who plays the fiercely sharp matron of the family, Polly Gray, sat down with Metro to give the scoop on season 5, talk the progression of the characters, and dive into why the violence in the show is completely warranted and even essential.

PROVIDED

A lot has happened over the past five seasons. I'm curious to see what progressions you've personally seen with your character, Polly Gray?

Polly is an interesting character. She's tough as old boots but there's a big difference between being tough as old boots and killing someone, you know? When she gave herself to Sam Neill's character in the second series and then shot him at the end of that and said the line for the first time, "Don't f—k with the Peaky Blinders" — I've literally had that shouting in my head for the last four years. That was surprising to me, when he took her there. But that's the joy of Steve Knight's writing. He doesn't decide, OK, so Polly is going to be the straight one and the strong one, therefore she's not going to go here. Instead, he says, no, this can all happen to Polly. Like her son coming back or her near-death experience which leads her to hear voices. You think, OK, well what is this? Has she taken too many drugs or something? But Steve will say, "Oh no, no ... She really hears voices." He's constantly pushing the boundaries with her, which is fantastic. That's the fun part of playing Polly and working on "Peaky Blinders."

How do you get yourself into the "Peaky Blinders" mindset?

For me, it's the clothes and it's the walk. I'll always wear that same tight silhouette because I believe there is something quite strangled about Polly. She's always pushing against something. But whenever I have my first scene with Cillian [Murphy], I'm always back in that headspace. It's Tommy who really grounds Polly.

What's your take on some people claiming the show has gotten more violent?

I don't know if it's gotten more violent, but I think the violence is different. If you remember the first season and the first few scenes, where people were shell-shocked when they came into the pub and started shooting ... You just had these scenes were everything explodes. But I think the mental scars that the war gave those men have impacted the violence. But perhaps it's more palatable for people in the first few series because it was clearly a result of the brutality that they had seen. People forget we're only talking about four years later.

What's in store for fans for season 5?

Steve's writing is just superb and [season 5] is almost like a portrait of Tommy's mind unraveling. Steve talks about ideas all of the time: Can you run away from your past? These people who are criminals in the beginning, can money free them? Can they become a part of society? Can you do that and can you transform yourself? Or will you always be dragged back and reminded of who you are? I think some characters can, but with Tommy, you find him just getting iller and iller as the season goes on, and there's such a cacophony of pain in his mind — and I love that.

Music, feelings and vulnerability

Lauv gives Metro the scoop on his "autobiographical" album and worldwide tour.

MOLLY GIVEN
Molly.Given@metro.us

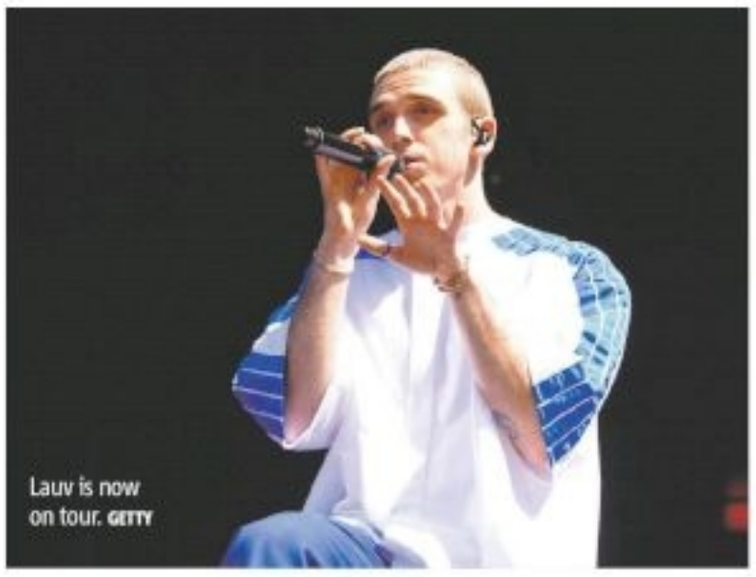
Many have heard the unique synthesizing beats and catchy songs produced and performed by singer-songwriter Lauv. The "I Like It Better" artist broke into the music scene in 2015, and since then has amassed a loyal fan base. But for the 24-year-old, music is so much more than a catchy way to get people dancing; it's a catharsis. Lauv has hit the top of the charts with his catalog, but he's also broken down the stigma of hiding your problems and shadowing life's frailties. In fact, Lauv's latest album, "How I'm Feeling," does the exact opposite. What the popular musician wants the world to know is exactly what is going on in his head, the good and bad, and to him, there is nothing more admirable than the strength of being vulnerable. Lauv sat down with Metro to talk about his interesting outlook on his latest album, his tour, and why being present in the moment is truly the best way to find yourself.

You've said before that you have written beautifully tragic music since a young age. What inspires you and your writing process?

It's actually evolved over the years. When I was 18, I put out 17 songs just about one girl, just all of the ups and downs of that relationship and trying to figure myself out and my identity through that whole experience. But all of the stuff from the new album, "How I'm Feeling," has been super diverse. I've started to be inspired in different ways, not just about love and hopeless romanticism and stuff. It's more about just really anything in my life at this moment. I have autobiographical songs, existential songs, and obviously songs about love and break-ups. But there are also songs about my dog, my favorite bars, ... literally just everything from my life.

You utilize a lot of musical gadgets, using synth sounds and other tools. Are you excited to see what technological advancements come out in the coming years?

For sure. Production-wise, for me, I like my songs to be classic at their core, but I get bored if I don't sonically do something kind of weird and kind of different. Whenever I do get bored, I always just look to download a bunch of random sounds and find random samples and so on and so forth. So definitely, I think if music keeps on growing, it'll be exciting.



Lauv is now on tour. GETTY

With your album "How I'm Feeling," you are releasing the songs as they are made instead of altogether. What element does that add to the listening experience for viewers?

There are a couple of reasons as to why I did that. One of the big reasons was because [for] a lot of 2018, I was sort of mentally going downhill and I wasn't very productive. I was supposed to be working on the album, but truthfully it just wasn't working out. So when I started to get back into a better place mentally, I kind of realized that I didn't want to wait until the whole album was done, or keep people waiting. I wanted to put stuff out as it was ready. So that was a big part of the reason as to why I did that. I also was putting out songs that felt like they needed to be immediate.

Now, jumping to your tour, what do you like the most about getting to perform your music live in front of audiences?

That's a hard question, but I think one of the biggest things, for me, are the unexpected moments that happen every night. When I totally get lost in the moment, things happen or I learn something new about myself or about a song or even about my fans. I could have a certain interaction with someone in the audience that just is a human experience. I think that's the best part: when everyone is totally lost in the moment. It's a rare thing to do. People spend so much time in their own heads, it can be hard to connect like that.

What do you hope audiences take away from attending one of your shows?

I think the big thing for me has to do with this project that I've started while touring the past few years called "My Blue Thoughts." It's actually evolving right now, so it's going to expand. But basically, I leave a box out and I encourage people to write whatever is on their mind or whatever thoughts they have in a way that's cathartic for them. Music has allowed me to really have this big catharsis about what I'm feeling and I wanted to give everybody in the audience an opportunity to do the same thing and have a chance to learn about themselves or to maybe realize something about themselves and to be vulnerable. That's the biggest thing for me, to get people to be vulnerable.

RUTHLESS SOX PREP FOR REBUILD

OPINION

MATT BURKE

Matt Burke is the Executive Sports Editor at Metro US and the Editor in Chief of MetroBet.

Bill Belichick is regarded as one of the more ruthless figures in the history of pro sports. He cut Lawyer Milloy, he traded Drew Bledsoe within the division, he exiled Jamie Collins to the Browns, and this past summer he cut arguably the best punter in the NFL over the past decade.

But Belichick looks like a sentimental cream puff when compared to Red Sox ownership, who have had an incredible amount of turnover in the front office, in the dugout, and on the field over the past 17 years.

The Sox are again looking for a new GM this offseason, are seriously considering trading last year's AL MVP Mookie Betts, are poised to let JD Martinez walk in free agency, and are one bad month away from firing Alex Cora.

All of this is coming just 11 months after the team posted a franchise record 106 wins and dealt the Dodgers a gentleman's sweep in the World Series.

Who in the world would want the Red Sox GM job?

Coal miners and textile workers have better job security.

It's amazing to think about, but Brian Cashman has been in charge of running the rival Yankees for over 20 years now – and the Yanks have won a quarter of the number of championships as the Red Sox have since John Henry and Tom Werner took over the Boston franchise in 2002.

It used to be the Yankees, under the late George Steinbrenner, that used to have the hottest GM and manager seats in baseball – but Henry's Red Sox have barreled past them this century in terms of ruthlessness.

The two franchises have gone about things in totally different ways over the years, with the Yankees always relevant but typically unable to come up with a World Series ring, and the Red Sox willing to go in the tank for a year or two before rising from the dead to again to make a run at a ring.

Consider that the Yankees haven't had one below .500 season since 2002. The Red Sox, meanwhile, have had three - just this decade (2012, 2014, 2015).

These year-to-year roller coaster rides by the Sox - with new hirings and firings happening at a Trump-ian level - have been chaotic and bring a boatload of drama during the winters here … but the approach has definitely worked in terms of ultimate success.

The Red Sox are the most successful franchise in baseball since 2002 with four titles. Only the Giants and Cardinals can approach that, with San Francisco having won three World Series' and St. Louis having won a pair.

Maybe to succeed in baseball in 2019 you need to have high turnover in the front office and in the dugout. Maybe the way to go is to take the NBA approach of either going for broke and shooting for a ring, or completely tanking. Maybe the wisest move for the Sox is to trade away Betts, let Martinez and his fat contract walk, and sell off some other parts in order to rebuild the train-wreck that is the Boston farm system.

Look, the way Henry and Werner go about things is slimy for sure. Theo Epstein couldn't wait to get out of town, they pulled the rug out from underneath Ben Cherington, they subjected fans to a full season of Larry Lucchino's wrap-inventing buddy Bobby Valentine, they raised ticket prices yet again this week after a craptastic season, and we're still waiting on that Dave Dombrowski press conference. They are absolutely terrible at public relations, as any person with half a brain can see how phony the whole operation is down on Jersey Street (David Ortiz suddenly throwing out the first pitch the day after the canning of Dombrowski … really?).

But with all of that bad, comes a boatload of good in the form of a World Series title every four or five years.

We may be about to enter a dark period again - possibly the darkest period if they trade away one of the biggest fan favorites in franchise history in Betts … simply in order to save some money.

But by now we should trust the way Henry and Werner conduct their business – warts and all. It's often nauseating, but if it ultimately results in another championship early in the 2020s, sign me up.

It's getting busy on the sports betting beat!

The Bruins begin their 2019-20 regular season Thursday night on the road against the Dallas Stars. It's the first of four road games (also at Arizona, Vegas, and Colorado) before the Bruins play their home opener on Saturday, Oct. 12 vs. the New Jersey Devils.

Action formally begins Wednesday night in the NHL with a four-game schedule. The Tampa Bay Lightning enter the new campaign as Stanley Cup favorites on global futures boards. A pricing composite shows Tampa Bay at 7/1, followed closely by the B's, the Vegas Golden Knights, and the Toronto Maple Leafs at 10/1 apiece.

Divisional action in the Major League Baseball postseason also begins Thursday night with a pair of National League matchups. The American League begins its "best-three-of-five" rounds Friday. Futures prices haven't adjusted much in recent weeks. There weren't any dramatic injuries for the top contenders. And, many are so deep with talent anyway that they would have been able to compensate with quality backups.

Markets see the Astros and Yankees as the most obvious championship choices in the AL, the Dodgers and Braves in the NL. Here's a look at composite odds from global sportsbooks involving those current favorites (equivalent win percentages in parenthesis).

*Odds to win AL: Astros 10/11 (52 percent), Yankees 2/1 (33 percent).

*Odds to win NL: Dodgers 4/5 (56 percent), Braves 3/1 (25 percent).

*Odds to win World Series: Astros 2/1 (33 percent), Dodgers 13/5 (28 percent), Yankees 4/1 (20 percent), Braves 15/2 (12 percent).

Note that sportsbooks build a universe larger than 100 percent to create a house edge. That's why the "big four" listed add up to 93 percent in World Series win expectation all by themselves. Bettors rarely get "true odds" when playing futures.

As for the Patriots, New England will likely close around a 15-16 point favorite on the road at Washington. That's its third double-digit point spread through five games. The Patriots continue to run into bad teams run by inexperienced quarterbacks (Washington preceded by the New York Jets and Miami). The schedule won't toughen until late October, when a gauntlet begins against Cleveland, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Dallas, Houston, and Kansas City.

Aries Don't leave anything unfinished or to chance. Partnerships should be handled delicately to bring about positive changes that will improve prospects for future dealings.

Taurus Step in and do something. You can make a difference if you use your voice to point out what's fair and what isn't. You'll gain respect and leave a lasting impression.

Gemini You'll be drawn into emotional situations. Listen to the options being offered and consider whether you want to get involved. Joint ventures look dicey. Protect your possessions and reputation.

Cancer Get moving. Idle time will be the enemy. The less you do, the more criticism and complaints you'll encounter. A change of heart will leave you in limbo. Protect your assets.

Leo Refuse to let the actions of others stop you from doing your own thing. Follow your heart and pursue the goals that make you happy. An unexpected development will turn in your favor.

Virgo A change will be enlightening. Rediscover what brings you joy, eases your stress and makes you feel alive. Socialize, participate and expand your interests and friendships.

Libra Express your thoughts and make changes that will help you eliminate things that are holding you back. Expand your mind and reach out to people who share your beliefs and ambitions.

Scorpio Turn the corner and put the past behind you. Head down an exciting path filled with new challenges and life-altering experiences. It's time to live life your way.

Sagittarius Listen carefully, as the information someone gives you will be untrustworthy. Spend your time researching and making personal changes that will help you overcome obstacles. Romance will enhance your life.

Capricorn Take better care of yourself. Pay attention to detail and don't get involved in something that could result in injury or loss. Choose your battles wisely.

Aquarius Get your personal papers in order. Updating official documents will be essential if you don't want to pay a fine or be denied the opportunity to participate in something you want to do.

Pisces Keep an open mind, but don't be gullible. Someone will play with your emotions or entice you to get involved in something you should avoid. Discipline and self-improvement should be priorities. EUGENIA LAST
